To The End Erich C. Polnow

Revelations was just the beginning... I vaguely recall a time when the world's worst fear was witnessing its own end. Then, nearly thirty years ago, the strange phenomenon that was later to be known as "the Bite" spread across the globe as quickly as it was rumored. Scientists, scholars, clergy, and world leaders alike all argued over its root cause. Virus, plague, the result of comets, biological weapons, the second coming... All they could agree on was the fact that all recently deceased cadavers return to a state of insatiable hunger for living human flesh. And any infection from those to the living turned them as well. The leaders of the world talked as the casualties climbed as quickly as the walls that desperately attempted to save humankind. As months fell off the calendar into years, the world completely collapsed. Looting and pillaging quickly evolved into rape and murder. Blood spilled like a river from the hands of men, women, and children, both the living and the dead. When all was said and done, the apocalypse had come and gone, but it left us very few and with a whole new existence. Survival amongst the dead. Whomever remained as friends and families banded together as warriors, gangs, and thieves in an attempt to rebuild something that resembled civilization. Fortress became turf became village became town. Eventually, a remote city, honeycombed behind towering borders, arose in the midst of the sea of the dead. It's inhabitants' hearts and heads became as cold and strong as the steel we wield. Grounds held tight with iron fists. The rage of our mounted losses was only matched by our spirit to survive. Our will, a re-adapted primal struggle to not only remain, but to feed off of the histories of what once was so that we may one day put an end to this waking nightmare and never repeat the mistakes of our past. We strive to rekindle the world of old before the very idea of "final death" leaves with the last person that remembers it. And we aim to see it through to the end.
