The purpose of this guidebook is to get you thinking about writing for real—in your college classes, in your major, and in your future field. And, with any luck, convince you (if you don't believe so already) that writing is something you can do for yourself in your own voice, for your own purposes, and for audiences that matter to you.

Does it sound strange to think of yourself as a designer when you're writing something? Wording, vocabulary, tone, evidence types, patterns of organization, quoting vs. paraphrasing—all are design choices to consider when composing a document. This guidebook will help you look at your role in writing in a totally new way.

This is the first of a series of books that give students a starting place when considering the writing they may have to do in their major courses and in their professional jobs in the future.
